These measures have either become obsolete and unimportant by the lapse become obsolete and unimportant by the lapse below the supreme controlling power, already a boll attempt at occupanting power, already become obsolete and unimportant by the lapse of time and the rapid progress of the nation, or they have been finally and conclusively adjudicated and settled by the fiat of the people, by permanent legislation and by an agreement of public opinion.

At the dawn of the American party, the old party lines had ceased to have any reference to matters of public interest; they were fast becoming dimmed and obliterated; they were kept up only by the personal ambition of the leaders of factions struggling for office and for power. The great statesmen, the noble-minded, purchearted chieftains, who had advocated with great zeal and ability the measures which divided and gave vitality to these parties, hat passed away with the adjustment of the measures of party policy. The parties themselves
